

The Whole Journey Communications Audit

A printable exercise for seeing who your current communication serves, where trust is being built, and where the journey goes quiet.

What this map reveals

- Each spoke represents one stage of the future congregation journey: Awareness, Visit, Attend, Member, and Minister.
- The center represents niche or insider communication that assumes significant context and trust.
- The outside represents broad or public communication that can be understood by more people with less context.
- Plot every current communication piece on the spoke for the stage it primarily serves. Place a piece between spokes when it genuinely serves both.
- Look for crowded areas, empty stages, and places where communication attracts attention but provides no handoff to the next faithful step.

The goal is not to move every dot to the outside.

Broad communication is not automatically better, and insider communication is not automatically a problem. A healthy strategy intentionally serves people across all five stages and creates clear handoffs between them.

Before you begin

- Gather a representative sample: videos, social posts, emails, web pages, signage, forms, classes, invitations, and follow-up communication.
- Work with people from communications, ministry, hospitality, groups, and volunteer leadership. The future congregation experiences one church, not separate departments.
- Use pencil or removable notes. The first map should describe the journey people experience now, not the one the team hopes it created.

Name what you are already making

List recurring communication and current campaigns before plotting. Do not judge the work yet. First, make the system visible.

ONE PIECE MAY SERVE TWO ADJACENT STAGES

Plot the journey you actually created

Write an abbreviation for each communication piece on the spoke it serves. Move outward for broader reach and inward for more niche or insider communication.

Read the shape before you solve it

Where is the map crowded?

Where does the journey go quiet?

Where is the handoff missing?

Plan the next part of the road

Plot the communication you need next. Build a balanced strategy around real gaps, clear handoffs, and the next faithful step at every stage.

Five decisions for the next season
